Section A: Research Methods

Observational research aims to gain a close and detailed understanding of a particular area of study, usually a small group, through the researcher studying the group in their natural environment. This form of study can be either participant or non-participant.

Observational studies can also be conducted in a covert or overt way. In the case of overt observation the researchers will reveal their identity to the group they are studying; in covert observation they will remain hidden.

Observational studies tend to produce qualitative rather than quantitative data. Although the studies may produce in-depth data, they can lack reliability and there may be difficulties in recording the observations.
