Section A

Answer question 1.

The process by which individuals learn the culture of their society is known as socialisation. Primary socialisation, probably the most important part of the socialisation process, takes place during the early years of life, usually within the family. Learning plays an essential part in creating social beings and this takes place primarily through interaction with others. At an early age individuals become aware of the existence of others and take this knowledge into account as they form their own identities. Most sociologists suggest that the identities that are formed during socialisation, far from being natural, are linked to social roles and are thus socially constructed. For example, gender roles are shaped by learning the forms of behaviour that are thought appropriate to one gender and inappropriate to the other gender.

- 1 (a) What is meant by the term socially constructed? [2]
- (b) Describe two ways in which the family contributes to the formation of gender roles. [4]
- (c) Explain how infants learn to interact with other people. [8]
- (d) Assess feminist explanations of gender differences. [11]
